Details:

Relocating a retail store comes with a unique kind of pressure: every day of disruption is a day of lost sales, and the store still needs to look presentable and functional the moment it reopens. At Fragile Removals, we understand that a retail move isn't just about shifting stock and fixtures from one address to another — it's about getting your business back in front of customers as quickly and cleanly as possible.

Careful Handling of Stock and Fixtures

Retail environments are often full of items that need individual attention — display units, shelving, glass cabinets, and stock that ranges from sturdy to genuinely fragile. Our process treats every item according to what it actually is: fragile stock like glass and breakables is wrapped with bubble wrap, padding, and boxed before transport, while shop fittings and furniture are handled with the same no-dragging, no-pushing standard we apply on every commercial job, protecting your new premises' flooring from day one.

Documentation That Protects Your Business

Before any uplift begins, our team completes a walkthrough and risk assessment, photographing the store and noting pre-existing conditions. Every item is logged with a condition report as it's packed, and photographs are taken before and after both the uplift and the reinstatement at your new site. This detailed record protects you if any dispute arises about the condition of fixtures or stock, and it's standard practice on every commercial job we run — not an optional extra.

Minimising Time Offline

For a retail business, the relocation window is the single biggest factor in how much revenue is affected. A structured process — proper planning, the right crew size for the job, and lifting equipment used ahead of manual handling — means your move happens efficiently rather than dragging on. Heavy or awkward fixtures are always handled by a team, never a single person, which keeps the job moving at a safe, steady pace rather than stalling on difficult items.

Setting Up Your New Store

Reinstatement at your new location follows the same careful sequence: floor protection installed before anything is moved in, controlled placement of fixtures and stock, and a final round of documentation photos to confirm everything has arrived and been positioned correctly. The goal is a store that's ready to open, not a pile of boxes for your staff to sort through.

Protecting Fragile and High-Value Stock

If your retail offering includes glass, artwork, electronics, or other delicate items, these receive full wrapping treatment as high-value goods — never transported loose or with partial protection. That same standard applies whether it's a single display piece or an entire stockroom of breakables.

A Relocation Partner Who Understands Retail Pressure

Retail moves happen on tight timelines because every closed day matters. Our professional and courteous crews are used to working within that pressure, bringing the documentation, equipment, and experience needed to get your store relocated and reopened with minimal disruption to your customers and your bottom line. Talk to us early so we can plan around your preferred reopening date.
