Even with the most careful crew, the best packing materials, and a well-planned route, a move involves transporting your belongings through the world — and that means it's worth understanding how insurance protects you along the way. At Fragile Removals, we believe your belongings are priceless, and that's exactly why we take transit and storage insurance seriously.

What Interstate Transit Insurance Covers

For long-distance moves, transit insurance is designed to protect goods for the entire journey from origin to destination. It's calculated as a percentage of the declared value of your goods — commonly around 3% — so the cost of cover scales with what you're actually moving. For example, insuring goods valued in the thousands typically results in a premium in the low hundreds of dollars, giving you cover proportionate to what's at stake without unnecessary complexity.

This kind of cover is particularly relevant for interstate relocations, where goods spend longer in transit and travel further from your immediate oversight. It's built in as part of a comprehensive door-to-door interstate removal service, so protection follows your belongings continuously rather than only applying at certain points of the journey.

Storage Insurance

If your move includes a period of storage — whether that's a short-term gap of a week or a longer-term monthly arrangement — storage insurance extends a similar layer of protection while your belongings are held in a facility rather than in transit. It's a small addition to your overall plan that closes a gap many people don't think about until it's too late.

Why Insurance Matters, Even With Careful Handling

Professional removalists take extensive precautions — detailed condition reporting, before-and-after photography, secure strapping, and proper wrapping of every item — precisely because moving involves risk that no amount of care can reduce to zero. Insurance isn't a sign that something is likely to go wrong; it's a responsible layer of protection that reflects how seriously a mover takes your belongings.

How to Think About Declared Value

When arranging insurance for your move, it helps to have a realistic sense of the total value of what you're moving, rather than underestimating it. Declared value is what your cover is calculated against, so an accurate figure means your protection actually matches what you'd need to replace if something did go wrong.

Peace of Mind From Pickup to Delivery

Insurance is one part of a bigger picture that includes professional packing, careful handling, and clear documentation at every stage. Together, these elements are what allow you to hand your belongings over on moving day and know they're genuinely being looked after — not just transported.

If you're planning a move and want to understand what level of cover suits your situation, our team at Fragile Removals can talk you through the options as part of your overall moving plan, so there are no surprises and no gaps in protection.
