Details:

Sydney to Melbourne is the reverse of Australia's busiest interstate corridor — around 880 kilometres, and one of the most frequently run relocation routes in the country. Removalists know this road intimately, which works in your favour when planning the move.

What Drives the Cost

Pricing on this route is built on a kilometre-based transport rate for a two-person crew and large truck, combined with the volume of your household or business goods. Because so many removalists run Sydney-to-Melbourne regularly, pickup and delivery can typically be completed within one to two days, keeping costs more predictable than longer interstate hauls.

Door-to-Door Transport

A genuine door-to-door service means your belongings are loaded once in Sydney and unloaded once in Melbourne — no depot transfers, no unnecessary handling along the way. Ask your removalist directly how they sequence this to minimise transit time and handling risk.

What to Ask Before Booking

- Is your quote itemised — transport, packing materials, insurance shown separately? - Is the crew AFRA-accredited and police-checked, with no subcontractors on any leg? - What packing support is available for fragile or high-value items like glass, marble, artwork and electronics?

Timing Your Move

The Hume Highway corridor can see increased demand around school holidays and public holiday weekends, so booking a few weeks in advance helps secure your preferred date and crew, particularly during peak relocation seasons.

Making the Most of a Familiar Route

Because this corridor is run so frequently, it's worth asking your removalist specifically about their experience on the Sydney-to-Melbourne leg — how overnight security is managed if the move spans more than a day, and how they document your goods' condition at both ends.

Sydney to Melbourne is a substantial move but also one of the more straightforward interstate relocations to plan for. With an AFRA-accredited, experienced team managing the details, it's one smooth journey rather than a logistical challenge.
